A DOUBLE FREE PICNIC THAT IS

BUT A PICNIC IS NO FUN UNLESS YOU CAN HAVE IT UNDER A TREE

SAYING IS BELIEVING

Henery Hawk saw his friend Olive Owl sitting under a tree and, as a ways, reading.

"What's your book about?" Henery asked.

"It's a book of famous sayings," Olive reported. "Like 'Crime does not pay' and 'Birds of a feather flock together' and Hold on, Henery interrupted. "What does that last one mean?"

"Why? It means that birds of the same species prefer birds like themselves to different kinds of birds," Olive explained.

"Swallows stick together, and so do finches or ravens... or owls, like me."

"Does that include chickens, too?"

"Of course," replied Olive. "Chickens certainly like other chickens better than chicken hawks like you," he laughed.

"You've just given me a great idea," cried Henery as he ran off.

With a can of paint and a brush, Henery began applying a yellow color to his feathers. When he finished, he looked himself over carefully from head to toe.

"I look so much like a chicken, a most fool myself," he decided. "Now I won't even have to chase those little chicks. They'll flock right to me, thinking I'm one of them, just as in Olive's saying."

Happily, Henery scampered off to the chicken yard. Squeezing under the fence, he joined a little group of chicks. His yellow feathers fooled them completely. He just looked like another chicken, so they paid no attention to him.

"Ho, ho, ho!" Henery chuckled to himself. "Look at me, surrounded by plump chicks! Why didn't I think of this plan before?"

Greedily, Henery looked over the flock of baby chickens and selected the biggest, fattest ones he could see. Then WHAM! He grabbed them and ran away with them.

Holding on to the squirming chicks and never looking to one side or the other, or up or down, Henery did not see a big chicken hawk circling above him. The hawk, fooled by the yellow-painted feathers, was as eager to grab up Henery as Henery was to grab up the little chicks.

"What a nice, fat chicken," thought the hawk, swooping down on Henery and catching him in its sharp claws.

"Awk!" Henery cried when he found himself looking into the face of his captor. "I'm a hawk, too! Let me go!"

"Ha, ha!" scoffed the big bird, "whoever heard of a yellow-chicken hawk? You can't fool me. You're a chicken!"

"A fool ed these chicks," Henery cried. "You and I are birds of the same feather, and we should stick together."

But no matter how hard Henery talked, he could not convince the bigger hawk.

"Oh, woe is me," Henery sighed as the hawk carried him and the baby chicks off.

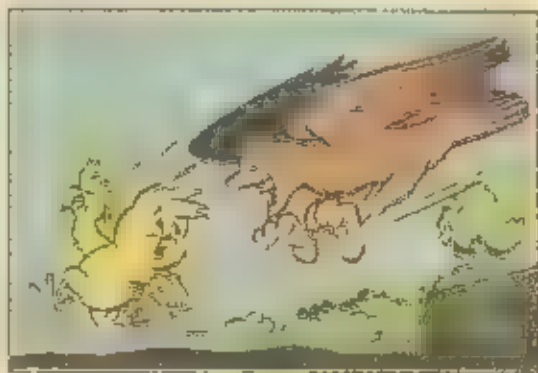

Now know how these chicks feel. I'll never catch one again."

Henery felt so sorry for them, he let the little chickens go. Watching them flutter safely toward the ground and freedom, he thought, "I wish I'd have that much luck."

As if in answer to Henery's wish, his good deed was rewarded. A lucky rain began to fall, and soon the yellow paint on his feathers was washed away.

When the big bird saw that Henery was really just a chicken hawk like himself, he squawked in disgust and let Henery go.

Back on the ground again, Henery thought, wisely, "I should have paid more attention to that other famous saying Olive told me about. 'Crime does not pay.'"
